

ROHINTON MISTRY

A Fine Balance

IMPRESSIONS · READ SEPTEMBER 2026

Why, he wondered he kept working now... Why did he not jump off the top of one of them? Why did he not make a bonfire of the receipts and the cash, and throw himself onto it drenched in kerosene? How was it his heart kept beating instead of bursting, his sanity intact instead of shattering like a dropped mirror? Was it all made of tough synthetic material, like the indestructible plastic folder? And was time, the great vandal being neglectful ?

"God is dead" said Maneck. "That's what a German philosopher wrote".... "And do you Believe it?" (asks Dina) "I used to. But now I prefer to think that God is a giant quilt maker. With infinite variety of designs. And the quilt is grown so big and confusing the pattern is impossible to see, the squares and diamonds and triangles don't fit well together anymore, it's all become meaningless. So he has abandoned it."

— Maneck

He shrugged again. "Stop speaking with your shoulders. Your quilt-making God has sewn a tongue inside your mouth. Why did they talk to you but not to me?"

"Maybe they were afraid of you"

"Afraid of me? What nonsense. If anything, I was afraid of them. That they would find the export company and cut me out. Or that they would get better jobs. Sometimes I was afraid even to point out their errors - I would correct the mistakes myself at night, after they left. For what reason could they be afraid of me?"

"They thought you'd find better tailors and get rid of them."

She considered it in silence for a moment. "I wish you had told me before. I could have reassured...

Dina and Maneck finally talk about their relationship with Ishvar and Om.

“But nobody ever forgot anything, not really, though sometimes they pretended, when it suited them. Memories were permanent. Sorrowful ones remained sad even with the passing of time, yet happy ones could never be recreated - not with the same joy. Remembering bred its own peculiar sorrow. It seemed so unfair: that time should render both sadness and happiness into a source of pain.”

“You see, we cannot draw lines and compartments and refuse to budge beyond them. Sometimes you have to use your failures as stepping-stones to success. You have to maintain a fine balance between hope and despair.’ He paused, considering what he had just said. ’Yes’, he repeated. ’In the end, it’s all a question of balance.”
